E. Alice Austen, [View from the gate at Clear Comfort], 1891.
Alice Austen captured hundreds of nautical views with her camera, including her friends at play, the fishing industry, immigrants arriving to their new homes in America, the development of New York City, warships, naval parades, and even the last voyage of the Lusitania.

“With the Narrows fifty yards from her front door, Alice naturally became a strong swimmer with absolutely no fear of the water.

Even when hampered by a long-skirted traveling dress, she did not give a moment’s thought to the obvious risk of crawling along a rotten log into the middle of a rapid stream in pursuit of the perfect photograph.”

— Ann Novotny, Alice’s World. 1976 (pg. 39–44)

E. Alice Austen, Our party in stern of Wabun, 1892. Collection of Historic Richmond Town.

Original glass plate negative.

One of America’s first female photographers to work outside of the studio, Austen often transported up to 50 pounds of photographic equipment to capture her world. Her photographs represent street and private life through the lens of a lesbian woman whose life spanned from 1866 to 1952. Austen was a rebel who broke away from the constraints of her Victorian environment and forged an independent life that broke boundaries of acceptable female behavior and social rules.

From the harbor views of Austen’s front doorstep to the international waters of her extensive travels, Picturing the Water explores Austen’s deep connection to waterways and the vessels that traverse them. Collections research for this exhibition uncovered a rich archive of over 1500 images.

Austen was independently wealthy for most of her life and was widely considered to be an amateur photographer because she did not make her living from photography. However, in addition to completing 10 years of commissioned assignments to document the people and conditions of the immigrant quarantine stations in New York during the 1890s, Austen copyrighted, exhibited, and published her work.

Austen’s deep fascination with documenting the water is little researched and the sheer volume of work indicates a committed professional interest in documenting not only the beauty of watery reflections and plays of light, but the technical workings of ships and their monumental presence both on and off the water.

The newly printed photographs for Picturing the Water are mounted in John Noble’s signature handmade frames and reflect on parallels between the artists’ visions.

Collection of Historic Richmond Town.

Original B&W print.

Austen’s penciled inscription on back: “Cloudy / Canal / Sodertelge / 5.15 pm / Aug 16th / 1912.”
Several sailboats on a waterway with islands in the background.

Austen's penciled inscription on the back of photograph reads: "Malaren / Lilla Island / schooners loaded with / wood / Aug 16th 6.30 pm."

The quarantine boat James W. Wadsworth is tied to the Cyrene, a large steamship; front view. Fort Wadsworth is visible in the background.
Original glass plate negative.

Front view of the hull of a shipwreck along the Staten Island waterfront.

Original B&W print.

Possibly Conelius Vanderbilt III’s North Star, a steam yacht with passengers passes through New York Harbor on an overcast day (Manhattan skyline visible; Brooklyn Bridge visible in far distance).

Original B&W print.

Three girls (backs to the camera) stand on wooden boards. Location unknown. Possibly Bay Head, New Jersey.

Original B&W print.

End view of a steamship with an American flag in front and numerous small flags flying from the rigging. Sign on the front of the ship: “NOTICE. / THIS VESSEL HAS / TWIN SCREWS / KEEP CLEAR OF / BLADES”. Inscription on the front of the ship: “QUARTERMASTER”. Two tugboats are alongside. Location is probably New York Harbor; a small part of what might be a Staten Island Ferry gate is visible at bottom left corner of photograph.

Original B&W print.
Two sailboats; location unknown.
Two large passenger steamships (ocean liners) in the vicinity of Clear Comfort (Austen house). The ships are Paris (French line, left) and Europa (North German Lloyd).
E. Alice Austen, [Night image, moon shining through tree branches], n.d. Collection of Historic Richmond Town.

Original film negative.

This appears to be a night image, with the moon shining through clouds behind a large tree in bloom at the waterfront edge of the Clear Comfort (Austen’s house) grounds; a large ship faces the grounds.
